

Comanche County in Pictures

To the people of Comanche County:

On the following pages are a collection of photographs of the people, places and things that make up the history of Comanche County. They are obviously not the entire story, but their value to the preservation of history is immeasurable, as are any effort to preserve history, in words or photographs.

As we sat down in early March to sort the photographs into sections we were reminded of the hardships the early settlers faced when an ice storm knocked out not only the electricity but also the phone service. As we sifted through the piles of photographs by lamplight we laughed about the appropriateness of it all!

We hope you enjoy the result.

Potpourri

This picture is of a Mastodon tusk which we uncovered in the west ditch of the lower end of the cut section of the approach to the newly constructed Cimarron River bridge south of Protection in 1930. We never found the tip end of the tusk, but did find several molar teeth and some vertebrae. The man lying along the tusk is Roy Mudd who was working for the county at that time. We notified the University of Kansas historical society and they took the tusk and other parts to the university in Lawrence. (Waldo Wollam)
